The available data for assessing the effects of airborne particulate metal dust exposures are numerous and document exposures to both acutely and chronically toxic metals in a variety of exposure conditions and in a variety of communities. Generally, these data have been obtained under controlled or laboratory-type conditions (e.g., fixed or periodic time-weighted averages) or based on job task analyses. In contrast, limited studies have assessed the impact of workplace conditions on resulting exposures for specific job groups, particularly with regard to the impact of increasing physical job demands.

Consequently, there are no data concerning human health risks associated with secondary dust exposures under varied work environments, for example, in northern communities, where the use of well equipment for pulp and paper production or secondary processing of coal may lead to the generation of metal-containing waste dust. This article proposes a conceptual framework for more thoroughly characterizing a site-specific exposure assessment approach and presents an assessment of airborne particulate levels and certain metal mass concentrations in a single pulp and paper plant in northern Ontario. Specifically, the data from the pulp and paper plant investigation illustrate the degree of exposure to selected metals in a community environment and the impact of certain plant operations on dust-generating and particle-transfer mechanisms. These data illustrate the importance of developing a site-specific approach for characterizing the potential for human exposures. The invention relates generally to underwater communications and more particularly to underwater communications with protection against surface to surface based monitoring of transmissions between divers. In recent years, the use of underwater communications with the use of surface-based monitoring of transmissions between divers has become an increasingly popular practice. Generally, to enable divers to communicate underwater, a commercially available apparatus is used which includes a source of electrical energy and an electrical transducer such as a transducer for a hydrophone. The hydrophone converts pressure waves which are created by sound waves into electrical signals. The electrical signals are typically transmitted to a surface vessel where they are processed and ultimately translated
